LATER EUROPEAN NEWS.

The arrival of the Great Western in New York on the 24th September, furnishes us with European intelligence TWENTY DAYS LATER. The reader will find every article of interest transferred to our columns.

The Transatlantic Steam Company advertise that they have rechartered the steam ship Royal William, and purchased the new steam ship Liverpool, for the navigation to New York. The former was to sail on the 20th of September, and the latter on the 15th of October. We may thereforecount on a steam communication with Europe throughout the winter, of which there was before some doubt—indeed the navigation of the Atlantic by steam may now be considered perfectly established.

CITY EXCHANGE HOTEL.

We understand that the City Hotel, St. Louis street, will be thrown open on the 1st November, and will be ready to accommodate the large number of individuals who for some time past have been impatiently awaiting the period of the opening of this magnificent establishment. Situated in the central city of Louisiana and between the two principal theatres in the city, it should hold out a strong inducement to all those who resort to the city for pleasure or business, and to the proprietors of lodgings, if it even possessed no other recommendation to the public. But when we add to the advantages of its location, those derived from its vast and elegant rotunda, its ball room, confessedly the most gorgeous and bright one in America, a suite of commodious and beautifully furnished lodgings, to any, an unlimited number of apartments fitted up with every attention to comfort and convenience, and presenting a magnificence of proportions, style and splendour, entirely new and novel to the eye. Carpets in every room from the ground floor to the uppermost story, an adequate supply of skilful, honest and intelligent servants, and the whole superintended by gentlemen who will spare nothing that can gratify the most fastidious, the public may form some idea of the advantages and resources offered by the City Hotel.

The hotel stands on a lot extensive which distinguishes it from any other in the world known to the citizens. We do not think that the Capitol at Washington in the United States, unless the Capitol at Washington be an exception which can compare with it in its commanding location, in its proportions, or in its unbounded extent of ground. The ball-room exclusively has been pronounced by the highest admiration and delight to all who have beheld it. Of pending one thousand, comprising twelve drawing rooms, sitting rooms, with a profusion of paintings, gilt cornices and other decorations, intended with a due regard to comfort, we may say, in a most brilliant and beautiful manner. The ball-room is illuminated by the chief, massive gas lit chandelier, which contains. As an evidence of the enormous expense incurred in the preparation of this magnificent establishment, we state that the paintings on the ceiling cost thirty thousand dollars, and the
