SATURDAY MORNING, OCTOBER 4, 1834.

MR. CLAYTON AND ABOLITION.

This was the subject of a long speech, which occupied the entire morning session of the Convention, and which, we understand, was in reply, were it not that the principal speaker seemed to be fortified against all attempts at reply, we should be tempted to call it a reply to the speech of Mr. Clay, which we published a few days ago, and which we have since seen, from time to time, quoted by the opposition papers in this city, as the best speech that has been made against the Convention.

It is regretted that Mr. Clay, in his speech, did not confine himself to the question of the propriety of the Convention, and the propriety of the measures which it has proposed to adopt, and which, if they should be adopted, would, in the opinion of Mr. Clay, be productive of great evil to the State. But he has made the question of slavery, and the propriety of its abolition, the principal subject of his speech, and has, in the course of his remarks, made a direct attack upon the Convention, and upon the principles and measures which it has proposed to adopt. He has, in the course of his speech
