Russia and Turkey—The state of Europe.

In our rapid summary of European intelligence we devoted a space yesterday briefly to the [illegible] of Russia and to the position of the European powers with respect to the Eastern question. The role which Russia has been assuming in the complicated diplomatic politics is so important, as to merit a more careful effort to trace her progress and to expose the denouements which she is aiming. We have been aided in our report by a very intelligent and disinterested authority.

Nothing is more certain than that the Czar has been for some time making stupendous preparations for a fixed object, and that the statesmen of Europe have been perplexing themselves in endeavoring to ascertain the precise point to which these movements tend—Europe and Asia Europe is divided upon this question.
