

THE BEE.

NEW-ORLEANS,
THURSDAY MORNING, MAY 17, 1881.

We are compelled to leave out several interesting articles, which had been prepared for to-day's paper, on account of the number of advertisements we have to publish.

The sale of lots in Milneburgh, began yesterday, as it had been advertised in most of the city papers. This sale, of course, could not be closed in one day; the reader will perceive in an advertisement published to-day, that it is to be continued at twelve o'clock, and if not done at three o'clock, it will again begin at half past four, and thus every day, until the whole be sold.

Contrary to the expectation of many, these lots have been sold at a very high price; one brought $3600. There will be found in the French side a statement of the sales of yesterday; the sum total amounts to 122,445 dollars for 121 lots, eleven squares. The Rail Road Company purchased nearly all those fronting the road and the lake. It is said that many of the purchasers intend building immediately.

MOBILE, May 11.
Mail Route to Pascagoula.—We are happy to announce the repair of the bridges on this route. The line of stages is resumed, and we understand the road is in good repair.

RAILWAY.—The company incorporated by the name of the Mobile Marine Railway Co., under Rogers' Patent, have completed their works, and we understand, are prepared for business.

On Saturday last, the schooner America, fitted with a false keel and sent back to her element. The launch was very beautiful. The principle upon which this Railway is constructed, is considered by judges as superior to any other, six men were a sufficient force to bring up the schooner; and ten would be sufficient for vessels of the largest size.

The ship Shaws, Davis, fm Liverpool, for this port, touched off the Bar on Sunday, and bore away for New Orleans.

The brig Ventrosa, from Liverpool, for this port touched off the Bar on Monday, and bore away for New Orleans.

came intimate at her home; for he admired her in truth, but his heart was too fully engrossed with another passion, to love sincerely. He knew that her possessions were extensive, that she had no friends to advise, and that, although able to maintain external appearances, his own circumstances were in a desperate condition.

Hamilton's visits to Clara became frequent, and he soon declared his passion in warm, eloquent and touching language; his importunities were constant, and he painted his feelings in the most glowing colors. "Why lovely Clara," he exclaimed, "will thou not look kindly upon the man who lives for thee alone, whose love, pure and single-hearted as it is, if unrequited, will drive him to madness?"

For a season all was sunshine. Charles treated his wife with the kindness of an affectionate and devoted husband; Emily resided with them, time glided along pleasantly, and Clara was happy. But the spell which her charms had thrown around Charles, was soon broken: he had again possession of money, his besetting demons tempted him, and he resorted once more to his old habits. He had a constant run of bad luck, and his wife's fortune was, before many months had elapsed, in the hands of more expert gamblers than himself. He now became thoughtful and morose. Clara was exceedingly distressed, she suffered for a time in silence, but his eddies increased so much that she could bear it no longer, and one evening when he seemed unusually abstracted, she threw her arms around his neck, beseeched him to explain to her the causes that made him so unhappy, and protested her readiness to bear any thing for his sake.

As her head rested upon his bosom, he parted the locks that fell in disordered ringlets over her beautiful forehead, and shaded a brow that, young as it was, had begun to wear the import of care. His glance caught the imploring look of those eyes which had once sparkled with a diamond brightness, but were now dimmed with tears that gathered fast, and dropped upon her cheeks which vied no more with the rose's hue, but were fair to claim affinity with the lowly lily. For a moment his better feelings had the mastery; he pressed her fondly to his heart, and kissed off her tears with all the warmth of pure affection.

But alas! this feeling was soon subdued by his dominant vice, and he was even more than descended to a falsehood to save his credit from his wife. He asserted that his capital had been invested in such a manner, that if pressed, he would be obliged to sacrifice a great portion of it; that demands had been unexpectedly made upon him; and that he knew no one would relieve him; that he feared not for himself, but the idea of being compelled to bring her to comparative poverty, had almost brought him to frenzy. Emily, who had witnessed the scene I have attempted to describe, was delighted to have it in her power to relieve the difficulties of her brother-in-law, and to do away the unhappiness of her sister. She immediately offered to loan her portion of the estate, it was accepted by Charles with every expression of gratitude, and content appeared to become an inmate of their dwelling.

But this was a short and delusive calm—it was like a gleam of sunshine amidst a stormy day, bright but transient. Charles continued in his old habits; he frequently remained out late, was often intoxicated, and one fatal night shortly after he became the father of a lovely infant, he lost the remainder of the money he had obtained from his sister. He was now so all restrained; he was constantly intoxicated, and quickly fell a victim to his excesses. This state of affairs, Clara soon began to have a just notion of this pitiful world, and she saw that she had not remained a wrong opinion of the beings around her. She found it necessary to sell her best furniture, and to remove with the sister, to a miserable hotel in an obscure alley.

Clara felt all the warmth of a mother's affection for her lovely offspring. This stimulated her to exertion and energy; she gave up her mind, which would, probably, have otherwise sunk with despondency. And well it was, for the cup of affliction was not yet full. At the close of a gloomy, boisterous November day, as Emily was sitting beside a fire, flickering fire, musing over that sacred book which has comforted and infused patience and hope into the breasts of many a son and daughter of adversity, she uttered an appalling cry, and was instantly distorted and rendered helpless by paralysis. This was a severe blow to Clara; she missed her with the kind and anxious care of a sister's love, but she was too weak to visit, and in a few days she closed her eyes upon this world and its troubles forever. The few dollars that Clara had been able to save, were spent in performing the last sad rites for her sister, and she was destitute of money and friends; the only cemetery that was open for Emily Howard was—THE POTTERS-FIELD! Clara alone followed the plain hearse, and verified the expression that,

"There is a tear for all who die,
"A mourner o'er the humblest grave."

But, oh! what must have been her feelings, when she returned to her lowly habitation, to find it in possession of officers, directed by one who had professed the highest friendship for her husband, in case a small demand was not satisfied. This was impossible, and in possession of laws, which she should blush to think ever existed, she was incarcerated. Her delicate frame suffered dreadfully from the foul air and damp walls of the prison; and when liberated, she was so much afflicted with a rheumatic affection, that she has since been scarcely able to perform the humble duties to which she is compelled to resort, to support herself and educate her daughter, who inherits all her mother's early beauty, and being schooled in adversity, gives promise to trust, like her, in that power, and praise that goodness, which, it has been beautifully said, can "blow up the broken heart," and "temper the wind to the shorn lamb."
