J. BAYON. NEW-ORLEANS, TURSDAY MORNING, NOVEMBER 8, 1831.

Yesterday's mail brought New-York papers of the 24th, Baltimore of the 25th and none from Charleston. The Baltimore American announces the arrival of the Lady-Adams, from Liverpool, bringing Liverpool dates to the evening of the 18th .-They add very little to the mass of intelligence received by the Norna at Charleston, and are mainly anticipated by the news brought by the Olympia.

We learn that a British squadron had left for the Tagus; the British subjects in Lisbon having received new insults from the Portuguese government, this expedition sails with the view of exacting re- earthquake was generally felt, in the town and paration. Such, at least, according to the English neighborhood, papers, are the instructions of the fleet; but we might probably put another construction on this expedition. The schemes of Don Pedro are still talked of in France, and it may be, that England, at all hazard, wishes to take the initiative, and protect by the presence of a fleet, before the walls of Lisbon, her interest and influence near the Portuguese government, in case that Don Pedro's expedition, backed by the power of France, should prove successful. This is a mere supposition which we advance with due caution; but which may not be wholly stripped of probability when we reflect on the interminable cackling of Lord Aberdeen on the pitiable condition, the suffering condition of poor Portugal, the old ally of England, the vexations Imposed upon the humane Don Miguel, and unjust pretensions of Don Pedro to the throne, claimed by Dona Meria.

We again recur to the reported dismission of the Duke of Mortemart, French Ambassador near the Cabinet of St.-Petersburgh, in as much as the Baltimore American infers, that the fact is unfounded, because there are dates of the 24th of St.-Petersburgh, which make no mention of the circumstance. The probability is, that there is at least an error in the dates. We mentioned yesterday the arrival in the roadstead of Lubeck, in the steamer Nicolas Ist. on the authority of Galignani's Messenger. Immediately below we find the annexed arrival announced:

" Baron Galz de Malvirude, Consul-General Russia, arrived at Paris from St.-Petersburgh. "The office which he occupied having been suppressed through motives of economy, French merchants will henceforward have to apply to the French embassy in Russia for all business that is connected with commerce in that coun-

By a collation of the two paragraphs we must inevitably conclude that some extraordinary cir- chants." cumetance must have necessitated the departure of the French Ambeliador from the Russian capital; for if the commercial interests of France were to be looked to, henceforward, by the French embassy, to whom will French merchants apply under the existing circumstances? We cannot for a moment admit the idea of the French Ambassador's wilfully abandoning his important trust, and leaving the commerce of France unprotected at the very moment that the recal of the Consul-General had thrown it under his safeguard. Our readers will please to note that he left St.-Petersburgh accompanied by his son and secretaries; which is tantamount to leaving no representative behind him. An act of imprudence of which he had never been guilty had he left the capital of his own ac-

FIRE AT PERA.—The conflagration originated in a different quarter from Pera, near the Field-of-Death, in *store-house filled with pipes of brandy. At twelve o'clock it had reached the vicinity of the faubourg. A rumbling noise, like the hollow murmurs, which foretell the storm, went before the flames and announced their approach. A numerous population crowding in narrow and glowing streets; the cries of old men, the lamentations of females and shrieks of children, blending with the plaintive groans of the sick; the yells of the scorched, the tortures of the dying, who dragging their tottering steps from the scene of horror, exhaled their last sight in agonies of suffering; must have moved every feeling for abolishing the heriditary Peerage was not ry' to the whole affur,—to transform it into a heart, while they called down indignation on the expected to be ready before Wednesday next. masquerade, or pupper show, and to weaken

The Scraskier repaired to Pera at about elever o'clock at night, but gave no orders for the suppression of the flames. He two shared in the marked apathy with which his fellow barbarians contemplated the destruction of the christian and, undoubtedly, only civilized portion of the imperial city. The horde of musselmen called from their homes by the No accounts had reached Paris from Portuglare of the flames exulted in the misfortune of the gal of later date than 24th ult. A report had christians, and said that "it was quite a different thing at Navarino." If it be true that this sentiment was expressed, it is teeming with dark con-Jecture ;-requires no comment and gives a full measure of the character of barbarians, whom nature herself, by the erection of a barrier, which they have infortunately passed over, seemed to have destined for the rugged crags of Caucasus, or the inhospitable wild of Asia. Time may throw light on this deplorable transaction. But one positive fact cannot be denied; bismillah, Allah! God is great! rung from the lips of more than one Turk, while all were seen malignantly to smile on the horrifick 21st inst having been attributed by the Miguelimages of despair, which were lightened up by the conflagration. The following is a succinet account the destruction of the principal buildings.

The palace of the French Ambassador, which contained costly furniture and paintings, is entirely consumed. The recently erected palace of the English Ambassador is also reduced to ashes, while the archives have been partially destroyed. All the Greek, Armenian and Latin churches, as well as the convent of Caloyers have been consumed : that part of Pera which had been saved from the conflag- kicks, and after an obstinate defence on the part ration of 1784, now presents, a vast extent of smoul-

The Austrian Envoy is the only one, who saved any property, owing to the timely and energetick assistance lent by the crews of the Austrian vessels. The loss of the English Embassy is rated at several thousand pounds sterling; the Envoy intends to have recourse against the Sultan and has entered a protest against the consequences of the dreadful event which be attributes to Turkish vindictiveness. The number of the dead is evaluated at 1800, but private letter of the Constitutionnel gives a revolting account of the impassiveness of the Turks. Lod has ordained it ! blasphemously exclaims the wreck of a whole population, when he has been successful in saving his cat, pipe and sophs from the general disaster.

The programme (as it is called) of the formality was previously known to the public, and which could not be alluded to in any program me, but which constituted, as will be allowed by every body, one of the most gratifying appendages of the whole solemnity, was the loud, hearty, and unanimous, acclamation which burst from all classes of His Majesty's affecionate subjects throughout the whole line of the Royal progress from St. James's to Westminsdue reverence for the sacred rites within the Ab bey admitted of any demonstrations of public The following note is from a proprietor of a feeling, -still more when certain periods of the service—as the recognition, the crowning, &c. -seemed more especially to call for Never was an hereditary King so hailed and welcomed by a free and reflecting people.

They are mistaken-but there are vast num pers thus mistaken-who deem of a coronation A few turkeys in front of my house siting on a as if it were an "unsubstantial pageant," a game the Court. It is the evidence of an austere and solemn compact, by which the gravest of all human engagements are reciprocated between society or its rain.

It is plain, therefore, that the more impressive and memorable such a formality between King and people can be rendered, the more conducive will be its attributes to its acknowledged end.

When protection and allegiance are mutually promised at the commencement of a new reign every reasonable man will agree that the compact ought to be ratified by religion,-that is to say, by a sanction which the bulk of mankind hold sacred.

It must be added, however, that the sanction imposed ought to be drawn from the fountains of that peculiar faith which is received as true by the parties binding themselves to observe it.

Nothing could be more foolish than to perform dize. a Te Deum, read the Litany, or appoint the Bishop of London to preach before a Mahomeloponesian audience; or the grotesque mixture of old Popish mummery with old feudal burthe King of ENGLAND and his people, being Protestants, of even their most sacred duties.

Yet, with the exception of the litany, and communion service, and the sermon (provided the latter be un exception, -that is to say, not t divine right and King's chaplain scr.non), what can be more thoroughly and revoltingly compounded of the worst dregs of Popery and feudalism, than a prodigious number of the quarkeries played off in the course of King WILLIAM'S COTODATION!

What a fuse with palls, and sours, and swords, and oil for anointing (greating) their sacred MAJESTIES! and whipping off and on of mantles! and the rest of it. They, what has all such frippery to do with an oath?-what with the spirit of a great political contract! - what with the splendour of a public festival? A recognition if you will, - there is a fire animating shout of acceptance when the Sovereign is presented duced into it, and were only prevented by the to his people.
