> ORIGIN OF THE STEAM VESSEL,-In 1543, Blasco de Garay, a captain of a ship, offered to the Emperor Charles V. to construct a machine capable of propelling large vessels, even in a calm, and without the aid of sails or oars. In spite of the opposition which his project met with, the Emperor position which his project met with, the Emperor consented to witness the expesiment; and it was made accordingly in the port of Barcelona, on the 17th of June 1848. Garay would not uncover his machinery or show it publicly; but it was evident it consisted of a caldron of boiling water, and of two whoels set in motion by that means, and applied externally on each side of the vessel. The experiment was made on the Trimidad, a ship of two hundred tone, laden with ears. The person consistent of the person consistent of
