The Argus cannot but sea the difference in giving all the facts as they are, instead of an interested partial statement. That a journal should return continually to the accusation with which it has charged Judge Dawson, without ever giving, although called on for the purpose, a single like of proof to denthlish it, is a course which we forbear from qualifying, as we have determined to abstain from all kinds of personalities; but the public can judge whether it he not pushing to the last degree, in the discussion, a nullity and want of candor, and whether accordingly, any bity and want of candor, and whether accordingly, any Don Pedro entered Lisbon.

One day may he spent most agreeably at Charlotteeville, the morning in a visit to Monticello, and the afternoon in another to the University of Virginia, the urbanity and politeness of whose professors can only be exceeded by their talents and fearning. Much of the expenditure must however have occurred in levelling the summit of Monticello and in getting a road to it. The great and absorbing point of interest yet remains. As you approach the house a small-enclosure of rough dry stone work indicates the family birrying piece. The tombetones elevated above the ground are seen in it, the upper one being that of a daughter of Mr. Jefferson and the lower of some other member of his family. Ten or twelve feet from the upper tomb, a small unobtrusive pavement of hrighs, seven feet by three feet, on a plane with the ground and half covered by its washings of dirt, cover the remains of a man who once filled so large a share of public attention, and gave such signal, directions to popular opinions—Thomas Jefferson—the author of the Declaration of Independence and one of the most active soutributors to it—a President for eight years of the Unithe greatest slarm and confusion.
