It is their custom, and we all know how difficult it is to divest surrely series those practices which have become fixed and settled principles—They can no more avoid this species of mistepresentation than they can the comais-cal and settled principles. They can do more avoid this species on instepresentation than they can the comains son of other pulpable and glating impositions on the peorple.

I have watched the course of those presses now so vocations for Mr. White, and Thave known here is a time of their statements. They cannot hope to succeed before the people by the assertion of truth and the vipul callon of cirrott principles. They have been too often decived by them, and depend on it, they have been too often elected their candidates both lacal and general by their skill in figures. One would suppose they would discontinue such a parade of noneshed, when they have been so often and so emphalically sealed with the stamp of illegitimacy by the people. But no—as if there was not the shallow of shame in their countenances, they still persist in their attempts to play off these farces before an intelligent and discontinue geomenancy.
