In a late on other of the Knickerhocker, an article on English and American steam-vessels, mentions the billowing curious fact. It seems hardly to be known, that a proper son-going steam-ship, well adapted to the unvigation of the Atlantic, was built and fitted out a seem fore full seventren years ago, when the art of seam navigation was in its very infancy. The name of this steam-slup was the "Robert Fulton," and she made a number of voyages to Havana and New Orleans; but owing to the ambarrassments of he owner, she was dismantled, and sold in another owner, she was dismanised, and soid in anomic country.

No doubt many of our readers remainber the fact of the Fulton navigating astween New Orleans and Havana, but they are not perhaps aware that she has been since converted into a slap of war, mounting the same of the twenty-six guns, and remarkable for her saiting qua twenty-was guns, and remarkable for her sailing quali-ities: having for several years past been attaolied to the Brazilian navy. The writer in the Knickbucker addle that this ship, if propelled by a modern engine, or with the peritoir of steam power which is more used in the best British steam-ships, would even now prove a successful rival to the Great Western; at least for it it better to encourage this growing and profit-ing. But they will submit to the loss of our for the productions of their industry with classes, if thereby they free themselves from the

The wrist joint is losser than usual, and his left himself that the same what pointed and inclined backward like the fangs of a snake. The right side of his fine is sensiily afferted, his mouth is drawn considerably further on the right than on the left dide; his right eye aquinds, has several deep groves radiating from it, and has a very singular appearance much resembling a snake.
But perhaps the most extraordinary circumstance on record, is, that his right arm, when not restrained, will ifraw the lower part to about a right angle with the upper, and sometimes two or three, but most commonly only the fore finger will project, curved at the first
