NEW-ORLEANS:
TUESDAY MORNING, AUG. 25, 1840.

THE MERCHANT.

What are those merchants that the energies of a great and powerful government should be strained to overwhelm and blast them? Are they enemies to public liberty whom the executive is called upon to destroy? Are their employments treasonable, that the administration press mock at their misery and deride their despair. In what way does their business or their prosperity interfere with the general happiness, that they are thus trampled down and oppressed?—The government that should protect is waging a ruthless war upon them; and the satellites of power rend the air with their shouts, as the honest tradesman sinks beneath unprovoked persecution, and the accumulated pressure of the times. Are they not men that their sufferings awaken no sympathy? Are they not citizens that the government treads upon and grinds them in the dust? Who are they, that there is no compassion for their woes, no commiseration for their anguish?

Let the honest citizen turn from the purchased ribaldry and sickening surfeit of the locofoco press, and read the history of the merchant as it is inscribed upon the pages of human amelioration. He need not go back to the period of ancient history when mercantile enterprise was already known and appreciated and had been the means of extending civilization to regions yet unknown. Let him look abroad upon the world as it is, and answer the questions which the monuments of civilization are perpetually suggesting to his mind. Turn in any direction he may, he will find the earth strewed with the noble evidences of mercantile energy and intelligence. He will find that cities are built up and beautified by merchants; he will learn that their enterprise has penetrated the remotest regions, carrying the light of learning and religion to realms but yesterday unknown to civilized nations; that he has whitened the ocean with canvass in collecting the harvests, and rich fabrics of distant latitudes, for the comfort and convenience of his fellowmen; that he has braved the deathlike coldness of the icy north, in carrying his country's flag to regions of perpetual winter, that he has to encounter the perils of the sea, the inhospitality of climates and the danger of infected districts in distributing the fruits of the soil amongst the people of the earth, and bringing back in return the productions of many nations.

Look at the actual progress our country had made and was making, in civilization and wealth, until she fell into the snares of locofocoism. Who has crowded our rivers with those magnificent floating palaces which defying the resistance of currents and the power of adverse winds, "walk the water" as if endowed with intelligence, annihilating space and bringing distant places into close proximity? The merchant. Who is it that has penetrated to the sources of the great Father of Waters, bringing back the fur of the north, opening to the industrious a wide field for exertion, and adding to the stock of human information, intelligence of an unexplored and savage country?—The merchant. Let the honest enquirer go through the cotton districts of the south, and behold the vast possessions redeemed from the wilderness, and made to blossom as a rose, through the credit and resources of the merchant and league with his oppressors if he can. Let him stand upon our wharves and contemplate the innumerable vessels which have brought to our shores the wants and luxuries of life, filling the public coffers with imposts and the country with plenty, and curse the merchant, if he dare.

Can the citizens of New Orleans look upon those noble structures which are at once the pride and ornament of the city, without being moved to say, such are the bright results of mercantile enterprise; and these are the members of society whom government with an unsparing hand have been incessantly persecuting for the last ten years, can they, we repeat, after such exhibitions still federate with their enemies? The merchants have also supplied the city with water and lighted it with gas. They distribute charities with a liberal hand and obey the calls of distress with alacrity. The wants of the needy and necessities of the sick are supplied by their generosity; and if in thus contributing to the behest of agriculture, the embellishment of cities and the happiness of others, they have endangered their own peace of mind, callous indeed must be the heart, that could rejoice at their misfortunes or aggravate their griefs.

Turn from the persecuted to the persecutors. Who are they? At the head of them stands Martin Van Buren—a man who has never yet originated a measure for the advancement of society or the promotion of general good—whose public career has been marked by no peculiar feature save duplicity, and has exhibited no resources except cunning—who has been brought into favor by the partiality of a popular idea; whose entrance upon the duties of chief magistrate has been signalized by the destruction and downfall of every interest. Evil has followed all his political acts, and he possesses neither statesmanship nor popularity. Which party then should the people of the United States protect? Let the good and evil which each has conferred upon the country, guide them in the decision.

Let them weigh the extension of agriculture against the evils of a depraved currency. Let them judge between the building up of cities and the destruction of commerce. Let them decide between the benevolence of charitable societies, and the tyranny of a cold and heartless proscription. If a vitiated circulation is preferable to the independence of the planter; if confusion in commerce is more desirable than the growth of cities, if tyranny is more acceptable than liberty, let locofocoism prevail, for those evils will ever attend its predominance. Let commerce and credit perish, and the merchant also—burn up his ships, his steamboats, his warehouses. Return to the wilderness the farms that have been opened by his credit—consume with fire the public buildings he has created—destroy the railroads, banks, canals, and other works that owe their construction to merchants. Let not a vestige of mercantile enterprise or the taint of trade remain to wound the eyes or offend the nostrils of purified locofocoism. Dispense with a class of men, which has been found necessary to society from the dawn of civilization till now, and do it at once.

If, however, the people are not prepared for so great a revolution, let them remember that no settled trade, no regular business can flourish under the auspices of "modern democracy"—that locofocoism or commerce must give way, and let them decide which of the two they will protect; and having decided, do it effectually.

NORTH CAROLINA ELECTIONS.

We are indebted to the Charleston Courier for the following intelligence from North Carolina. It will be perceived that it is highly favorable, and we can see more entertain the slightest doubt of carrying the state:—

ELECTIONS.

NORTH CAROLINA.—We are indebted to the Wilmington Chronicle for a slip, containing results of the election in that state, from which, principally, we make up the following statement. In 31 counties, heard from, Saunders, the administration candidate for governor, has a majority of 3429 votes. There are 37 counties more to be heard from, in which, in 1836, the whig candidate for governor, had a majority of 6866 votes. Should, therefore, there be no material change in these counties, the whig governor will be elected by 3000 majority.

In the legislature, we have heard of the election of 36 whig and 45 administration members. In the same counties in 1836, there were 33 whig and 49 administration members.

THE ELECTIONS.

We are indebted to the clerk of the steamer Wilmington, for St. Louis papers to the 15th instant. They contain further accounts of the elections in Missouri and Illinois. In the first named State, though the loco-cofos have succeeded, the whig gain is very large. In the legislature, particularly, the whigs have done nobly. The House consists of 109 members.—Of these the whigs have already elected 44—with a fair chance for success in several counties not heard from. In Warren county there is a tie between the Harrison and Van Buren candidates. In other counties the seats of the loco-focos will be contested. The whigs having kept up the circulation of the Governor's message—which, it is said, is being changed owners, will please present them without delay to
