

NEW-ORLEANS HERALD

FOR PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES
HENRY CLAY
Conducted by the American People.

FOR VICE PRESIDENT,
WINFIELD SCOTT
FOR GOVERNOR,
HENRY JOHNSON
FOR MAYOR,
WM. FRERET

FRIDAY MORNING, APRIL 1, 1842.

THE RIGHT OF SEARCH.

The real objects sought to be accomplished by Great Britain, in instituting upon the right of search, are evidently set forth in the following article from Boston Courier, that we have inserted at length:

The Courier is one of those Northern papers that can easily sympathize with the South. Its structures upon the Quomtine treaty are the result of a keen and judicious analysis of English politics.

It says—“The present administration has been compelled to make up its mind, and has decided to let the South go, or to make war upon it, according to the course of events.”—This is a bold statement, and one that we do not like to see made in a Northern paper, but it is nevertheless

true, and it is well known that the South will be allowed to go.

It goes on to say—“We are not to be afraid of the South, but we are to be afraid of England, who wishes to make war upon us, and will do so if we do not give way to the South.”—This is a bold statement, and

one that we do not like to see made

in a Northern paper, but it is nevertheless

true, and it is well known that the

South will be allowed to go.

It goes on to say—“We are

not to be afraid of the South, but we

are to be afraid of England, who

wishes to make war upon us, and

will do so if we do not give way to

the South.”—This is a bold statement, and

one that we do not like to see made

in a Northern paper, but it is nevertheless

true, and it is well known that the

South will be allowed to go.

It goes on to say—“We are

not to be afraid of the South, but we

are to be afraid of England, who

wishes to make war upon us, and

will do so if we do not give way to

the South.”—This is a bold statement, and

one that we do not like to see made

in a Northern paper, but it is nevertheless

true, and it is well known that the

South will be allowed to go.

It goes on to say—“We are

not to be afraid of the South, but we

are to be afraid of England, who

wishes to make war upon us, and

will do so if we do not give way to

the South.”—This is a bold statement, and

one that we do not like to see made

in a Northern paper, but it is nevertheless

true, and it is well known that the

South will be allowed to go.

It goes on to say—“We are

not to be afraid of the South, but we

are to be afraid of England, who

wishes to make war upon us, and

will do so if we do not give way to

the South.”—This is a bold statement, and

one that we do not like to see made

in a Northern paper, but it is nevertheless

true, and it is well known that the

South will be allowed to go.

It goes on to say—“We are

not to be afraid of the South, but we

are to be afraid of England, who

wishes to make war upon us, and

will do so if we do not give way to

the South.”—This is a bold statement, and

one that we do not like to see made

in a Northern paper, but it is nevertheless

true, and it is well known that the

South will be allowed to go.

It goes on to say—“We are

not to be afraid of the South, but we

are to be afraid of England, who

wishes to make war upon us, and

will do so if we do not give way to

the South.”—This is a bold statement, and

one that we do not like to see made

in a Northern paper, but it is nevertheless

true, and it is well known that the

South will be allowed to go.

It goes on to say—“We are

not to be afraid of the South, but we

are to be afraid of England, who

wishes to make war upon us, and

will do so if we do not give way to

the South.”—This is a bold statement, and

one that we do not like to see made

in a Northern paper, but it is nevertheless

true, and it is well known that the

South will be allowed to go.

It goes on to say—“We are

not to be afraid of the South, but we

are to be afraid of England, who

wishes to make war upon us, and

will do so if we do not give way to

the South.”—This is a bold statement, and

one that we do not like to see made

in a Northern paper, but it is nevertheless

true, and it is well known that the

South will be allowed to go.

It goes on to say—“We are

not to be afraid of the South, but we

are to be afraid of England, who

wishes to make war upon us, and

will do so if we do not give way to

the South.”—This is a bold statement, and

one that we do not like to see made

in a Northern paper, but it is nevertheless

true, and it is well known that the

South will be allowed to go.

It goes on to say—“We are

not to be afraid of the South, but we

are to be afraid of England, who

wishes to make war upon us, and

will do so if we do not give way to

the South.”—This is a bold statement, and

one that we do not like to see made

in a Northern paper, but it is nevertheless

true, and it is well known that the

South will be allowed to go.

It goes on to say—“We are

not to be afraid of the South, but we

are to be afraid of England, who

wishes to make war upon us, and

will do so if we do not give way to

the South.”—This is a bold statement, and

one that we do not like to see made

in a Northern paper, but it is nevertheless

true, and it is well known that the

South will be allowed to go.

It goes on to say—“We are

not to be afraid of the South, but we

are to be afraid of England, who

wishes to make war upon us, and

will do so if we do not give way to

the South.”—This is a bold statement, and

one that we do not like to see made

in a Northern paper, but it is nevertheless

true, and it is well known that the

South will be allowed to go.

It goes on to say—“We are

not to be afraid of the South, but we

are to be afraid of England, who

wishes to make war upon us, and

will do so if we do not give way to

the South.”—This is a bold statement, and

one that we do not like to see made

in a Northern paper, but it is nevertheless

true, and it is well known that the

South will be allowed to go.

It goes on to say—“We are

not to be afraid of the South, but we

are to be afraid of England, who

wishes to make war upon us, and

will do so if we do not give way to

the South.”—This is a bold statement, and

one that we do not like to see made

in a Northern paper, but it is nevertheless

true, and it is well known that the

South will be allowed to go.

It goes on to say—“We are

not to be afraid of the South, but we

are to be afraid of England, who

wishes to make war upon us, and

will do so if we do not give way to

the South.”—This is a bold statement, and

one that we do not like to see made in a Northern paper