THE NOMINATIONS.

Throughout the length and breadth of the land the glad tidings of the nomination of TAYLOR and FILLMORE have been sent upon the wings of the lightning messenger, and the responses of the people, joyous and enthusiastic, are pouring in upon us. Scarcely does a jarring note of dissent disturb the harmony of the great Whig party. From Maine to the Mississippi, the nominations have been hailed with the outpouring of popular pulses. The dismal croak of two or three discontented grumblers from Ohio and Massachusetts, is unheard or unheeded amidst the loud acclaim of the nation. Even the press of their own States has been foremost in cruelly rebuking the dissentients, by placing the names of the nominees at the head of its columns and pledging them an earnest and unwavering support.

We are delighted at this manifestation of unanimity in the Whig ranks. We had feared a more decided opposition. The devoted attachment of a portion of the Whig party to the quaint old Sage of Ashland, the strong desire of the Eastern and North Western Whigs that the Candidate for the Presidency should be chosen from a non-slave holding State, the moderate political principles of General TAYLOR, the evidence of sectional prejudice, and the force of personal predilection—all had combined to create in our mind an apprehension that the choice of the National Convention would be ill-suited, at least temporarily, by symptoms of dissolution and rupture, or by rash and unpopular expressions of indignation and dissent. The result has created the emphatic verdict of the rank and file of the conservatives of the Whig party. Thus far, there is scarcely a cloud to dim the splendor of the political horizon. In the North, one journal alone professedly Whig, hesitates to endorse the nomination. That journal is the New York Tribune—a paper which unites to undoubted talent a ferocious fanaticism that punishes its vision, and odious intolerance, wherever the South and Southern men are concerned. We can take no assurance to the sectional views of the Tribune. Let its editors or denounce Gen. TAYLOR as it pleases. It cannot create him in the North—as the South was unwilling more steadfastly to bear Clay, on whom she bore their love—so deemed and discarded by abolitionized New-York.

Mr. Webster, on his return to our city, was received by the Whigs in a manner that must have been gratifying to his feelings. The enthusiasm with which he was welcomed was a spontaneous burst of the popular heart. It was the outpouring
